SELECTED HIGHLIGHTED SPEAKERS

HIGHLIGHTED SPEAKERS (Click here CONFERENCE ABSTRACTS)

Dr Doris Corbett is the President of the International Council for Health, Physical Education, Recreation, Sport and Dance, a world-wide international organization represented in more than 135 countries. Her keynote address is entitled "Ethics and Moral Behavior in Sport: A Human Rights Issue"

Lloyd McDermott, the first assessor appointed to assist the Federal Court with Aboriginal land title claims is one of Australia's quiet achievers. Not only was he the first Aborigine to be appointed as a barrister in Australia but he was also the first Aboriginal Rugby Union international. His paper is entitled “The Level Playing Field – Myth of Reality”.

Alwyn Morris is a Mohawk Indian who serves as the chairperson of the Aboriginal Sport Circle and the Kahnawake Athletic Commission in Quebec Canada. He is a former member of the Canadian Olympic Team and 1984 Olympic Gold and Bronze medallist.

Professor Colin Tatz was made an Officer of the Order of Australia in 1997 and is Director of the Centre for Comparative Genocide Studies at Macquarie University. He has called his paper ‘ Sport, Race and Human Rights’.

Andre Odendaal was active in various anti-apartheid groups during the 1980s including the National Sports Congress. He attended the historic 1987 Dakar Conference in 1987 and was the only white provincial cricketer to join the non-racial South African Cricket Board during the apartheid years. He was involved in the planning and establishment of the Robben Island Museum, the former prison where Nelson Mandela spent so many years. The title of his talk is simply ‘Sport and human rights in South Africa’.

Darren Godwell is a Research Fellow with the Centre for Indigenous Natural and Cultural Resource Management. He is the recipient of an Australian Research Council grant to examine the participation and influence of Australia’s Indigenous peoples in the Sydney 2000 Olympic Games.

Dr Richard Giulanotti is a lecturer in Sociology at the University of Aberdeen and an international editor of the journal Culture, Sport, Society. His paper examines how sports like soccer have immense potential in combating traumatic experience for people, especially young people in zones of conflict, but warns that sport can underpin a form of slave trade of cheap export to the Western sports market.

HOW YOU PLAY THE GAME

The Sydney 2000 Olympics will be sport’s greatest celebration of human achievement, richness and diversity. In a unique global gathering at the dawn of the new Millennium over ten thousand athletes from 200 countries will compete before an estimated worldwide audience of over three and a half billion people.

More than ever before sport today is central to human society and inseparable from human rights. So, as the world marks the Fiftieth Anniversary of that great human achievement the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, the time is right for an exploration of the relationship between sports and human rights.

SPORTS AND HUMAN RIGHTS – AN OLYMPIC TRADITION

When black American athlete Jesse Owens broke the winner's tape in the 1936 Berlin Olympics thus shattering Hitler's propaganda of German racial superiority, he showed the power of the Olympics to advance the struggle for human dignity and human rights. This capacity was recognized in the opening ceremony of the 1998 Nagano Winter Games with the participation of land mines survivor, campaigner and athlete Chris Moon as Torch bearer and the call of Juan Antonio Samaranch for an Olympic Truce in the Middle-East.

The Olympic Movement took a lead in opposing apartheid and in welcoming the new South Africa back into the world sporting community. The Seoul Olympics is credited with helping to transform South Korea from dictatorship to democracy.

In the 1968 Mexico Games black American athletes on the winner's podium made a powerful statement for civil rights when they raised their clenched fists in victory. And in the face of tragedy at the 1972 Munich Olympics athletes took a brave stand against terror.

The relationship between sports and human rights goes beyond the Olympics. David Ginola, former French footballer of the year, was chosen to succeed Princess Diana as figurehead of the international campaign to ban land mines. Cathy Freeman's eloquent gesture in holding aloft the Australian and Aboriginal flags on her lap of honour at the Commonwealth Games expressed the mood of a nation searching for reconciliation.

The mass protests in Australia and New Zealand against the Springboks tours in the apartheid years expressed popular expectations of the contribution that sports people and institutions can play in respecting, protecting and promoting human rights.

Today this contribution can be seen in the dusty streets of South Africa townships, the divided countryside of Burundi and the city streets of Paris where sport is being used to build tolerance, understanding and respect, and to offer new opportunities to those with few.

THE CONFERENCE – A FIRST

As a contribution to the International Decade of Human Rights Education and to the Olympic spirit, the Human Rights Council of Australia proposes coordinating the first international conference of its kind on sports and human rights. The conference will bring together sports men and women involved in human rights advocacy, those who have survived human rights breaches, administrators and sports organizations that have contributed toward human rights and academics involved in the growing field of sports and ethics, and sports and society.

The Conference will provide a unique forum for discussion and help to stimulate further work in this area.

CONFERENCE ISSUES

International speakers will be invited to the Conference which will run over two and a half days in a major venue in the centre of Sydney. While the program is still to be finalized it is expected that it will include the following issues:

- The role of team sports in building reconciliation and tolerance: Experiences from Africa, Europe and Australia
- The role of sports people in human rights campaigning and as advocates for change: Australian and international experiences
- Issues facing indigenous sportsmen and women: Australia, Canada, Japan, Latin America
- Addressing discrimination in sporting bodies: on the field, selection of teams/individuals - off the field, participation in administration and management. Issues include HIV/AIDS, disability, gender, sexual preference, ethnicity.
- Solidarity between sportsmen and women: how can sports people support those in other countries – the role of professional sporting associations
- Drugs and sport: the human rights issues
- Opportunities for addressing human rights and for human rights advocacy around major sporting events: from cooperation to confrontation; from briefings to boycotts
- Human rights in the sports business – from running shoes to football kits: What are the responsibilities of sporting firms to their employees? How can consumers have a voice?
- Sport and the human rights to health and leisure: programs for popular participation in sport, access to sporting institutions by the poor and marginalized, the rights of spectators, the role of regulation in maintaining public access and free to air broadcasts.

SUPPORT FOR THE CONFERENCE

Expressions of support for the conference have already been received from the Australian Sports Commission, the Australian Football League, the Sydney Organizing Committee for the Olympic Games, the NSW State Government and the Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander Commission.
